TESTIMONIALS

Dear Roger & Steve,

I am writing to express my appreciation for your assistance in selling my house in the Maple Leaf district of Seattle. Your repair suggestions before listing, your answers to my questions, your willingness to negotiate a listing agreement, your responsiveness to my calls, your conduct at agent showings and open houses and your skills during sale negotiations were all performed in a very professional manner that I found very satisfactory and reassuring during this time of high anxiety and during which I was mostly out of town.

If I can ever be of assistance as a reference or you would like to use this letter for promotional purposes, feel free to do so.

Thanks again to you both and I hope you and yours have a wonderful holiday time.

Yours very truly,
David W. Roberts

MAYOR MCGINN 2011 STATE OF THE CITY ADDRESS

EDUCATION: Seattle has one of the most educated populations of any city in the country. But our children aren't catching up – in particular students of color. In 2010 only 13 percent of African American students and 24 percent of Latino students met the state's 10th-grade math standard, compared with 68 percent of white students. This is unacceptable and unjust. Seattle must do better.

In some schools, Seattle is already doing better. Four of our middle schools – Denny, Mercer, Hamilton, and Aki Kurose – have used funds from the current Families and Education Levy to produce significant improvements in student learning.

Mercer Middle School is one of many Families and Education Levy success stories. Mercer's students represent the full diversity of Seattle. 94 percent of the students are from communities of color. Nearly 75 percent are on free and reduced lunch. For most schools in this city and this country, those statistics would predict a high rate of student failure.

But not at Mercer. Principal Andhra Lutz has used the flexibility afforded by Families and Education Levy funding to create programs that help keep students in the classroom – and provide the support out of class that they need to stay focused. The results speak for themselves. Mercer students are outperforming their peers around the State in math. 88% of students have met their grade level standards in reading and math.

The Families and Education Levy helped make this happen. It gave Principal Lutz the freedom and flexibility to create new programs such as intervention for students struggling with math or with their attendance.

Seattle doesn't just hand out the money and hope it works. Programs aren't just funded – we track results of every program the city funds from the levy. If something isn't working, then the money will be redirected to programs that are showing results.

Thanks to the hard work of the community, Levy Advisory Committee, and Councilmember Tim Burgess, we produced a Families and Education Levy renewal for this year's ballot that reflects the community's priorities. The $231 million proposal serves an important goal: All students in Seattle will graduate from high school ready for college or a career. The levy renewal will meet that goal by funding programs that the Seattle Public Schools budget doesn't cover.

This money is directly invested in programs that help our children and families. We fund things like preschools, health clinics, tutoring, summer school, and similar wraparound programs – the types of things the school district cannot fund. We need to fully fund the proposed Families and Education Levy efforts in each of these five areas if we are going to help our children succeed.

TRANSIT: Now I want to talk about transit. The next-generation infrastructure requires us to move people as well as information. We have to use our money wisely and make smart investments.

President Obama wants to bring high speed rail to 80% of Americans in the next 25 years. I support that goal, and have already pledged to work with Mayor Sam Adams of Portland, Oregon and Mayor Gregor Robertson of Vancouver, British Columbia to connect us with high speed rail service.

Now, President Obama is focused on connecting cities. I'm focused on connecting neighborhoods. Here in Seattle, many of our neighborhoods do not have any passenger rail transportation at all. We are helping Sound Transit bring light rail to Capitol Hill, the University District, Roosevelt, and Northgate. And this year, we will break ground on the First Hill Streetcar project.

We're working with Sound Transit on the extension of its line north. But understand that when they build that stop at Northgate, that will be the last stop they build in Seattle for 30 years. I'm not being a pessimist. That's just a pragmatic assessment of their plan. It's going to suburban cities, and I want to say clearly, I have no beef with that. In fact, I support it. Those cities need to be connected to be transit.

It's no secret that I support rail, which is one of the ways that we can increase capacity. We've learned public supports rail, too. 57 percent of those who responded to our Transit Master Plan survey said they want rail to connect to major destinations within the city.

When the Transit Master Plan is finished this summer, we'll know which corridors are the best for high capacity modes such as rail. And I will send to the Council a Transit Master Plan for high capacity transit, including the kind of rail that makes sense for our overburdened corridors.

Another high priority corridor that needs rail is the 520 bridge. Right now the state plans to build a six-lane bridge, and they only have money to build six lanes to Foster Island, where it will become four lanes. They're engineering a traffic jam right next to the Arboretum and in Seattle's neighborhoods. And it's not going to be light-rail ready.

In addition, this bridge is planned to have variable tolling, which means that during various times of the day, the toll could be $7 or $8 each way. If they're going to charge that much to cross the bridge, we need to give people a low-cost transit choice – otherwise we've just spent $4 billion on bridge for rich people.

ASSESSOR AIMS TO DEMYSTIFY PROPERTY VALUATIONS

Like most county assessors – and real estate licensees – King County Assessor Lloyd Hara is quizzed about fluctuating real estate values and their relationship to property taxes.

More than 660,000 residential and commercial properties in King County are valued by the Department's staff of accredited real estate appraisers each year. In addition, personal property staff assessed more than 44,000 accounts in 2009. At a minimum, real property must be revalued on four-year cycles. These valuations generate thousands of appeals. In 2009, more than 13,000 appeals were received, with about 11,000 of them resolved to date.

Hara noted the Board of Equalization, an independent body whose function is to adjudicate appeals, is comprised of seven citizen members. These are political appointments, a process he would like to see modified to require some minimum qualifications.

One of the most frequently asked questions the assessor hears is why a tax bill increases when an assessed value goes down. Hara explained only 17 cents of every property tax dollar supports the King County General Fund. The remaining 83 cents are divided between the state, cities and other local jurisdictions; more than half the tax tab is based on voter approved measures.

With 165 local tax districts, King County ranks second behind Cook County, Illinois in having the highest number of such districts in the country.

The amount due depends on the cost of state and local government, including schools, roads, parks, libraries, hospitals, city and county government, as well as your local taxing districts such as port district, fire districts and sewer districts, Hara explained. A large part of each property tax dollar goes to pay off construction bonds for school buildings and other public projects, he emphasized.

In response to another question on whether a property could be reassessed if the view changes, Hara said absolutely, and invited affected owners to contact his office. He also noted it may not be necessary to go through the entire review/appeals process.
